In the spring of 1793, eighteen-year old Nancy Randolph, the fetching daughter of one of the greatest of the great Virginia tobacco planters, was accused, along with her brother-in-law, of killing her newborn son. Once one of the most sought-after young women in Virginia society, she was denounced as a ruined Jezebel, and the great orator Patrick Henry and future Supreme Court justice John Marshall were retained to defend her in a sensational trial.

This Dialogue has been pre-approved for three CMC or MMC Advanced Education Points with the satisfactory, timely completion of a learning assessment.

Attendees are required to purchase their own books and have it read completely prior to the dialogue.
